

Queens University senior Amy Bareham is double majoring in English Literature and Arts Leadership and Administration. From Weddington, N.C., Amy primarily spends her time writing and has been published in Charlotte Viewpoint, in the Queens Magazine, and on various blogs. Most recently, she has written a chapter discussing the student's role in arts funding which will be featured in a book edited by university advisor Dr. Siu Challons Lipton. Amy has interned with the Arts and Science Council of Charlotte and currently works as content creator for the Dixon Agency. Amy also spent a semester abroad at St. Andrews University of Scotland where she studied the modern novel and the history of Scottish literature. As a Queens University Presidential Scholar, Amy enjoys serving the community through educational programming and participating in various campus initiatives like the Student Alumni Council. She aspires to work as an advocate for the arts and fulltime writer in Charlotte, N.C.
